

Retail Market Review Response

It is wrong for energy companies to charge consumers less the more energy that they use. It should be the other way round. It can be in no way fair to penalise customers for being economical and conscientious and reward those who are wasteful. I propose that energy tiers be retained, but that the price differential be reversed, i.e. the first X units consumed be cheaper than the rest. Ideally, monthly usage in excess of a property's typical requirement (possibly calculated on the number of people registered there for Council Tax purposes) should be charged at a much higher rate.

██████████