

Retail Market Review Response

I agree that energy tariffs are confusing and difficult to compare, but the thing that really riles me is that people who pay in advance for gas and/or electricity through key or card meters have very little choice of tariff, and those on the most expensive rate, when they should by my reckoning get a substantial discount. After installation of the meter itself, the costs are minor to the suppliers compared with quarterly bills, and they already have the cost of the supply and the cost of the meter is paid for within the first year of use.
